

POWERFUL AERIAL BLOW BY ALLIES GIVES ASSURANCE THAT SQUADRONS OF NAZI PLANES WILL NEVER FLY

Huge Formations of American Heavy Bombers Carry Out Assaults—Knock Out of Operation Three Important Aircraft Factories in Very Heart of Reich—Opposition is Stiff.

(By International News Service)

Squadrons of German fighter planes that might have taken a heavy toll of American and British lives during the forthcoming Allied invasion of Europe, never will take to the skies, experts believe today in viewing results of one of the most powerful aerial blows of the war.

The assault, carried out by huge formations of American heavy bombers and their long distance fighter escorts, knocked out of operation three important aircraft factories in the very heart of the Reich.

For three hours—as they approached the target areas, unloaded tons of destruction and returned to their British bases—the Yankee raiders fought their way through some of the stiffest enemy opposition ever encountered. The strike was not made without cost; 59 of the four-motored American craft failed to return, as did five of their escorts.

However, on the profit side of the ledger were upwards of 100 German interceptors downed and the three important industrial plants destroyed or badly damaged. With this balance in mind, a military spokesman described the operation as a "major military success."

At Wichita, Kan., Gen. H. H. Arnold—chief of the U. S. Air Force—said: "Germany has been deprived of hundreds of planes that she would have turned out in the factories."

Arnold added that, "as a result of the air attack, hundreds of projected German fighter planes will never be manufactured to stop the Allied bombers or Allied troops preparing to invade Europe."

The raid, termed by some London papers as the heaviest of the war, was directed against plane plants at Halberstadt, Oescherleben and Brunswick. There was no immediate indication in official circles as to the tonnage of bombs unloaded upon the Messerschmitt, Focke-Wulf and Junkers factories.

Forty more German planes were destroyed on the Russian front before they could get off the ground. The official Soviet communique, telling of additional gains by the Red Army, said that a motorized force pierced Nazi defenses in the

Mrs. Harry Lair, president of the Morrisville Red Cross, today announced that plans for the holding of a blood bank in Morrisville this month have been postponed until a later date. Word to this effect was received from official Red Cross headquarters in Philadelphia, due to the fact that sickness and colds have been and are so prevalent. Prospective donors, however, will have the chance to give their life-saving blood to the bank in the near future.

Featuring the meeting of the Solebury Farmers' Club entertained at Trinity Hall, in Solebury, by Mr. and Mrs. Wilmet Quinby and Mr. and Mrs. Albert W. Preston were several demonstrations by boys taking the vocational agriculture course at New Hope high school.

These demonstrations were given after Lester Seidel, supervisor of that department in the high school, spoke of the aims and purposes of this course. He explained that one of the aims is to get the boys interested and established in agriculture. He described the practical angle wherein the boys select projects, include the raising of poultry, cattle and pigs. Emphasis was placed by Mr. Seidel upon the class room work. He also commented upon the importance of the boys keeping records.

At the conclusion of his talk Mr. Seidel introduced one of the boys, Michael Parhotnik, who explained the economic advantages of the Babcock milk tester. He was assisted by Harold Blowers and Charles Naylor, who demonstrated the testing of milk, which was 4.5 per cent butterfat.

Commander Clyde Reuben Flory, Sellersville's highest ranking Navy man, has been returned to duty after having recovered from injuries he received when he was aboard the battleship Savannah, which was bombed at Salerno, Italy, early last fall.

Commander Flory, who escaped serious injury, was about 50 feet from the place where an aerial torpedo struck the forward gun turret of the battleship. Movies shown recently in nearby theatres showed the bombing of the ship.

PLANES GUARD FLEET FROM ENEMY SUBMARINES; TASK FORCE ALWAYS READY FOR U-BOATS

This is the seventh of a series of eight articles about the journey home to the United States of a powerful naval task force from secret operations in northern European waters.

By Charles A. Smith
(U. S. Staff Correspondent)

ABOARD A U. S. BATTLESHIP in the North Atlantic, (Delayed)—(INS)—They put up our three tiny floatplanes today. We had reached that point in the desolate gray North Atlantic wastes where the air cover from England ends, and where there is several hours' steaming without land-based air cover before protection is accorded from the Canadian side.

This powerful United States naval task force of the world's most modern battleships and escorting destroyers was taking no chances of being surprised by a submarine pack during the gap, and our own planes and those from other ships took over the patrol job.

From a vantage point on the fantail, I watched our senior aviator wiggle his lanky form into the cockpit of his machine, followed by his observer-machine-gunner.

He gave his motor full throttle, made the "ready" signal to the catapult crew. There was the sound of a muffled explosion as the catapult charge was fired and "Bud" shot down the catapult and out over the sea, climbing rapidly. One moment he was there perched atop the catapult, the next he was dwindling to a pinpoint in the distance. It was that fast.

Throughout the day, the pilot and his assistants, as well as the other aviators, took off and returned after patrolling for several hours. They failed to sight anything—"not even a porpoise," as one pilot put it, and they returned with full bomb racks.

As each returning plane circled to land, our great warship reduced speed, executed a sharp turn, and thereby created a fairly calm "slick" of water. At exactly the right moment, each returning flyer brought his tiny machine onto the slick, opened up to full throttle, and bounced his frail craft over the still fairly turbulent Atlantic waves toward the stern.

The flyer cut his motor, climbed

BUCKS' QUOTA FOR FOURTH WAR LOAN SET AT $5,455,000

Judge Keller States Amount
Is $1,391,000 Less Than
For Third Loan Drive

WILL START JAN. 18TH

Complete Organization of
The County is Now Under Way

DOYLESTOWN, Jan. 13.—Bucks county's 4th War Loan quota is $5,455,000. Judge Hiram H. Keller, county chairman, announced Tuesday night at an organization meeting of some 70 men and women from every section of the county, at the Court House.

Judge Keller stated that the 4th War Loan quota is $1,391,000 less than the 3rd War Loan in Bucks county. He also stated that Bucks county reached 80 per cent of the Third War Loan quota in actual bonds sold. However, Bucks county would have reached its 100 per cent quota had the solicitors seen to it in advance that the county would get credit for a lot of bonds bought by Bucks county corporations outside of the county. In other words a lot of bonds were sold to Bucks county companies with offices in New York, Philadelphia or other cities.

With the slogan "Let's All Back the Attack," the 4th War Loan Drive is headed for outstanding success, it is predicted. Daniel Erdman, of Quakertown, in charge of the Bucks county bank sales, predicted that the bank quota would go way over the top this time.

The 4th War Loan Drive opens Tuesday, January 18, and continues to February 15th, but anything purchased from January 1st this year will count toward the 4th sales.

In Bucks county the $5,455,000 goal is broken down as follows: Individuals are given $2,822,000 in E bonds; $700,000 in E & G bonds and $1,010,000 in all other types. Corporations are scheduled to buy $1,463,000 in the county.

Complete organization of Bucks county is now under way. Judge Keller will announce in a few days the names of the various members of the big 4th War Loan team in the county.

O. Howard Wolfe, vice-president of the Philadelphia National Bank and executive manager of the War Finance Committee of Pennsylvania, was a speaker at the meeting here. He said the theme for the new drive is "Sacrifice—Every One To Buy Extra Bonds."

Mr. Wolfe stated that in the 3d War Loan, 50 per cent of the gains fully employed in the country were reached by personal solicitation. Of these 50 per cent bought extra bonds in September. Of those not reached by personal solicitation, only 17 per cent bought extra War Bonds.

"People will not buy bonds unless solicited," Mr. Wolfe declared. "Selling Bucks county's quota this time will not win the war, but the war will be lost unless all counties in the United States do their utmost to reach their quotas."

James Marvine, deputy manager of the community activities division of Pennsylvania, said that the plan this time is a house-to-house canvass on the entire home front, with a single miss.

Russell Zehner, deputy manager of the Valley Forge Division, of which Bucks county is a part, said

SHADES OF BUNKER HILL

An engaging story comes out of battle-scarred Changteh, China. It's about Sgt. Chow Shou-fu, a member of one of China's best divisions and a veteran of 10 years of fighting.

Sergeant Chow, interviewed by a group of foreign correspondents, gave them some of his impressions gained from much experience in battling the Japanese invaders.

Sergeant Chow thought the Japanese and the Chinese were well matched. The Japanese, he said, were young, strong, well-uniformed men of high spirits—but the Chinese morale was equally high.

He admitted the Japanese superiority in artillery, but advanced the opinion that the three "don't shoot" principles of Chinese gunnery more than made up the difference.

The three principles are:

1. Don't shoot unless you have a good mark to shoot at.
2. Don't shoot before you can see the enemy with your own eyes.
3. Don't shoot unless you are sure you are going to kill the enemy.

If those principles are strictly observed, they add up to a pretty effective system of combat. At any rate the Chinese are doing rather well with them. But it is exciting to imagine what the Chinese—who are doing pretty well with what the Chinese—who are doing pretty well with what they have—will do when they get into action with modern American equipment and plenty of it.

Sergeant Chow still has some experiences ahead of him.

THE INSURANCE ROW

There is much more to the current legal fencing concerning the fire insurance companies than meets the eye. The New Dealers are trying to make it appear that the insurance companies are doing a strange and undemocratic thing in trying to get legislation passed to prevent the Supreme Court from overruling a Federal district court on their immunity from Federal anti-trust prosecution.

The Van Nuys-Bailey bill, now before both branches of Congress, would definitely put Congress on record as desiring the regulation of insurance to remain the business of the states and making clear its temper that the Federal anti-trust laws are not applicable.

Not that all is sweetness and light in the insurance business. But the insurance men have heard the "palace guard" in Washington boast too often of what they were going to do once the insurance companies were Federally controlled. One might think that the New Deal had proved itself the very model of fiscal purity.

In short, the insurance companies have done a magnificent job for the country. The prices of protection have gone progressively lower and lower. And, certainly, they have proved themselves solidly solvent.

The financial independence of the firms must be maintained.

FASHION PARADE

By Milo Anderson
(Famous Hollywood Stylist Writing For International News Service)

HOLLYWOOD—(INS)—American fashion continues to show exceptional spirit, ingenuity and common sense in its varied design. Coats and suits in brilliant colors are playing the starring roles in Hollywood at the moment, as film notables appear at the various restaurants, the theatre and civilian defense spots.

The addition of purple accents to a light brown tweed suit attracted attention to Ida Lupino, Warner star now being seen in "Thank Your Lucky Stars," as she lunched at the Brown Derby the other day. Ida's suit was tailored with a knife-slit skirt, high-waisted and trouser-pleated, and a lapelled jacket with a waist-coat front. A beautiful soft sweater of purple cashmere was an unusual color contrast, and was matched with a felt postilion hat. Brown kid gloves, bag and shoes matched the shade of the suit, which was highlighted with a lapel clip of gold set with amethysts.

Henna brown and ice blue made a nice color team for Rosemary de Camp when she lunched at Chasen's recently. A lightweight wool suit in henna brown, with a bloused jacket, was combined with an ice blue velvet skirt and a draped wool turban in the same two shades. The colors were further themed with an interesting blue moonstone and diamond comet clip.

Loretta Young, dining at Romanoff's the other night with her husband, Lt. Col. Thomas H. Lewis, wore a black-magic two-piece wool jersey suit with gold bugle beads outlining the short-sleeved peplum jacket. Chinese dragons, set with multi-colored stones, were embroidered in a couled manner on the bodice. Her only jewelry accent was a pair of gold Chinese temple-bell earrings that tinkled whenever she moved her head. The border of multicolored stones on her small bag matched those on her high-heeled suede slippers.

BOBS RIGHT UP AGAIN

PHILADELPHIA—(INS)—Two years ago Anne M. Shields was turned down when she sought a job as a machinist in an aircraft plant. Today the 21-year-old Philadelphia is helping the army train fighter pilots to man the airplanes she wasn't allowed to make. Miss Shields, who received her wings as an instructor at Bruce Field, Baltinger, Texas, is the only woman instructor to take aviation cadets aloft for primary training at the base.

STRIPES FOREVER

It's never too early to get into that basic striped dress for office wear or shopping, spring or southern practicality. This style in gray and white from a New York designer sports a deep red carnation, and buttons in one-piece speed, with pearl. Long bloused sleeves, a concession to the season's slim silhouette, have the same hip-narrowing effect as widened shoulders. Lilly Dache's white felt hat and the white gloves may be alternated with red or green accessories to herald the first robin, or, for use right now, with navy or black. Newer and softer in line than the shirtwaister, this type of simple crepe in solid color, print or stripes is an all-purpose dress needed in every wardrobe.

THE LITTLE DOG BARKED by ANNE ROWE

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

Ada's knock at the door raised me. Hours later, or so I thought. She had been weeping. Her eyes were red and swollen and she looked terribly upset. And scared besides—of Josie Kilborn, I presumed.

"Please forgive me for this intrusion, but I had to talk to someone," she excused herself. "It's too awful—Mack lying dead and murdered over in that inn, while I was looking for him everywhere."

I agreed that it was awful, and offered her a chair. But she refused to sit down, with a worried glance over her shoulder, downward.

"If Mrs. Kilborn catches me here, sitting down, I'm out of a job," she said. "I may be anyway, if she hears I'd warned you. But I just got to talk with you about Mack."

"About why he was in the old inn last night?" I prompted.

She shook her head. "No. I don't know why he was. I hoped you might."

"I don't," I assured her. "I only saw him for a few minutes in the afternoon. He came out of the property shed when I passed by with Stray, and seemed pleased the dog had taken to me. He said: 'I don't remember the exact words, but the gist of them was, he thought Alden and Vickery—the two polecats' he called them—were 'cooking up' something to annoy Miss Barolle and me.'"

"Guess he thought they'd more'n annoy you," Ada ventured after some reflection. "Leastways, when he went home he did. I caught him, just as he was starting his Bertha, and tried to tell him you'd hired these here rooms. But he wouldn't listen. Said he was in a hurry. He'd found out something 'might put a different complexion on the goings on.' That's the way he put it. Mrs. Turner. And that he wasn't sure he was right, and had to go and 'look it up.'"

"Look what up, and where? It doesn't make sense to me."

Ada agreed: "No. To me. But then, Mack never made sense, right out. Always talked around things. But I think we'd know by now what he'd meant—if he hadn't been murdered."

"Yes—if he hadn't been murdered trying to protect Miss Barolle and me," I said gravely. "And that changes everything. After Miss Barolle's so-called 'accident,' I'd made up my mind to leave you and Mack out of it. But now? You wouldn't want me to keep things from the police that might help find Mack's murderer?"

"I sure wouldn't. And I don't care if Mrs. Kilborn fires me for it. You tell the police all you've a mind to. Mrs. Turner. I'll back you up." Ada then changed the subject: "I'm glad you sent poor little Stray to the vet's. Mack sure would have liked that. Did you have word from him about the 'rag'?"

I told her. Linda came in just then, and that ended Ada's visit. She immediately became the maid again, saying: "I'm glad you're satisfied with the ironing, Mrs. Turner. Hope you'll be too, Miss Barolle. Anything you want, just call for me," and went out.

Linda had made a remarkable recovery since I'd last seen her. Her dejection had vanished. She was all sparkle, behaving as if she hadn't a care in the world, instead of having narrowly escaped death a few hours earlier, or been an ear—if not an eye—witness of a man's murder, the night before.

The veterinary's pills must have had potent qualities, to work this transformation!

"I'm going out for dinner, d'you mind?" she burst out as soon as Ada had gone. "Bill Parris asked me, and Orne Paulsen heard him, and said, 'he'd go, too.' So now I have two escorts. Maybe I'll find out something tonight," she ended, as an afterthought.

"It's all right with me," I assured her. "So long as you're three, I should think it's perfectly safe. But I wouldn't go out with just one person, Linda. Not until we know who cut that rope and who killed old Mack."

For an instant fear was in her eyes. "You bet I won't! To tell the truth, I had the funniest feeling about Bill asking me. Till Orne lugged in, she confessed."

"I'm glad he did. He probably felt the same way about it I do," I ventured. "But—are you sure you can go? Didn't the sheriff say anything about staying on the grounds?"

"He didn't. And that's what started it. Bill thought it might be our last chance. Once this Inspector Something-or-other gets here, we'll all be under surveillance."

Linda ran to the closet in the hall between our rooms, leaving the door open. "Not that I care—much. So long as he lets us rehearse. Rehearsal was wonderful this afternoon. Too bad you didn't stay. We got through the whole third act. You wait and see, it'll be a go-rand performance! Uncle Ty'll be tickled pink."

By the time she was through with her rehearsal Linda disappeared into the bathroom with a gay: "Just have time for a quick shower."

Seven years made a lot of difference, I thought ruefully as I stepped to the side window of my room to watch the growing stream of prospective theatregoers. Linda, at twenty, made me feel old and carworn at thirty-seven. The way she managed to throw off the horror of what had occurred, and the dread of what still might happen.

Or—had she? Was her sudden lightheartedness a bit too pronounced? Did it simply prove she was a real good actress?

The thought wouldn't leave me, long after Linda—lovely in a yellow evening dress and woolly white coat—had departed. . . . What was the girl up to? What was she trying to find out from Bill Parris?

I went down to dinner into an empty dining room, and sat down to a meal that looked just as delicious as last night's. But I was so lost and lonely and miserable, I didn't taste what I was eating. All I could think was: "If only!"

If only I'd never written that fool play! If only I were in South America now, with Lee! If only McVane weren't out of reach! Ada! If only these dreadful things hadn't happened!

I was so sunk in self-reproaches and vain regrets, I didn't see Sheriff Weymouth in a natty blue straw suit, and carrying a large straw hat in his hand—coming toward me, and jumped when he said: "I'd like you to meet Inspector Pettengill, Mrs. Turner. . . . This is Mrs. Turner, Inspector. The lady had the good sense to holler 'police.'"

And that's how I met Inspector Josiah—Joe for short—Pettengill, of Clifton, Maine.

At first glance he didn't strike me as tall. Perhaps a contrast to Sheriff Weymouth's great length, and the six-foot-plus of most of the actors I'd seen around me all day. But five-foot-ten and a half is a respectable height for any man, especially if breadth and stamina is added to it. And I can truthfully describe the Inspector as a big man, with a sturdy, well-covered frame that somehow gave him a look of reliability, to which his round, jovial face—no older or younger looking than his forty-one years—added a cheery note in the fine laughing wrinkles around his clever, friendly eyes, and a mouth inclined to perk up at the corners.

Altogether, there was nothing formidable or smacking of the police about him. He was confidence—rather than awe—inspiring. Anyway, I trusted him instinctively, and found myself inviting the two police officers to have at least a cup of coffee with me.

An invitation which they accepted, and during which nothing more important was discussed than the natural beauties of Fern Cove, the fine reputation of the theatre, and the Inspector's "luck" in finding one of the spacious cabins on the short road vacant, and at his disposal.

"It'll make grand headquarters. A good-size living room for my office and three small bedrooms—for me, my assistant, Sergeant Hatch, and my stenog, Ted Hallet. They're coming tomorrow."

With that, Inspector Pettengill said cheerily: "I aim to show these headquarters to you right off, Mrs. Turner. Better get a coat. Evening's turned cold."

The spacious log cabin halfway down the shore road, which was to be Fern Cove's temporary police headquarters, had obviously been chosen for its isolation and the absence of spy-concealing shrubbery.

Presently we were sitting in its cheerful living room, and Inspector Pettengill was talking in earnest of the crime that had brought him here.

Been around a couple hours before I came to you," he informed me, teetering comfortably in a rocking chair. "Mostly over to that broken-down old inn—beats all, how they could put two women there overnight!—with the coroner and the corpse. I ain't so sure it's murder. Leastways, not first degree. The way the room's tore up, looks like a fight in which the old man got knocked down and fell on them andirons—the kind with 'shock' tips. Went right through his head."

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

I shuddered at the picture of old Mack impaled on the andirons, but—the Inspector's deductions tallied with Linda's report of thumping noises.

"Corse been took to the coroner's for an autopsy," the Inspector went on calmly. "Not that they'll find more'they know now, but it's the custom. Oh, before I forget: I got a message for you. From Dr. Gates, the veterinary. He come over to give Dr. Conant back his keys—after the coroner's the coroner—after taking an X-ray of this here little dog. He says for you not to worry. The pup'll be right as rain in a week. Nothing the matter but two ribs cracked, bruises all over and shock. That make you feel better?"

I thought the list of injuries quite sufficient for one small spitz, but I said courteously: "Much better, Inspector."

"Good! Then let's get down to brass tacks. Tell me all that happened since you come to Fern Cove. Sheriff here says it's plenty for one day."

I braced myself and pitched in, beginning with the lack of welcome at my arrival and ending with Ada's visit, and old Mack's enigmatic remark to her.

"Dropped smack into a peck of trouble, eh?" the Inspector commented when I had finished. "This here Ada now. You know anything about her, Sheriff?"

"All they is," Sheriff Weymouth told him laconically. "Born and raised here. Full name's Ada Trefthen. Teaches school in winter. Father's in lobstering. Lost her sweetheart making him wait ten years, for her to nurse her sick mother to death."

"Him—to death—the reliable kind! Guess I'll try see her tonight still," Inspector Pettengill mused. And then glanced at his watch, and from the watch at the sheriff who nodded, got up and went out.

"Going for more company," the Inspector explained. "Your—er—friend, Mr. Linwood. Should be here at eight-thirty, and it's most nine now. Might's well get done what I can tonight, spite not having my stenog till tomorrow. You don't write shorthand by any chance?"

"Sorry. I don't," I told him.

"But seeing you're a writer, I guess you type?"

I admitted I typed.

"Good!" he beamed at me. "Then you may do me a favor. Write down all you tell me, with the time each thing happened, far's you recollect. Also what Mr. Linwood says when he gets here. Will you?"

"Gladly, Inspector. Only, I'm afraid the time won't be very accurate," I told him.

"Can't do mo'n' your best," he consoled. "And, while we're waiting: what you know about that young actress was in the old inn with you last night and had that telephone booth aimed at her today?"

"Nothing," I said. "I'd never met her before. She's some connection of my producer, Mr. McVane. His ward, I believe. And I think he's arranged the tryout here mainly to try her out for the starring part."

"Quite a lot of nothing," grinned the Inspector. "What about her family? Where does she come from?"

"I wouldn't know. She's obviously well brought up and well to do. That's all I can say."

"Her manners. And her clothes. And when I mentioned the robber's price I'd been charged by the Kilborns she offered to give me a check for her share," I explained. "Also, she's traveled abroad extensively. She said she'd had a dog just like Stray, on the Riviera."

"Hm—ayah—ayah—you figure people don't say they had a dog some place, less they stayed there quite a spell," the Inspector nodded. "Good! I'm glad you're here."

I didn't see the connection between what I'd said and Inspector Pettengill's gladness, but I had no occasion to ask him what he meant, because at that moment there were footsteps on the porch, announcing new arrivals. And presently the sheriff came back with the disgruntled-looking Linwood in tow.

The scowl on the director's face didn't exactly decrease at sight of me. "I thought you wished to see me privately, Inspector—er—Pettengill?" he said with a baleful glance toward me.

"I do. We are private," the Inspector assured him, to my secret glee. "Sure you don't object to Mrs. Turner being here, seeing as she's the author of the play you're directing, and you—or one of your actors—called me on her say-so."

Linwood shrugged mutely, sat down on the chair the sheriff indicated to him, crossed his long legs, folded his gloved hands on the walking cane he affected—and waited.

And the Inspector watched the procedure with the open curiosity of a child, clearly intrigued by the movie-director outfit.

"You got sore hands? That why you wear gloves?" he asked at last irrelevantly.

"Certainly not, I—er—don't like my hands to—er—"

Linwood left the sentence hanging in the air, stripped off his gloves and held out beautifully manicured hands, in graphic explanation of his glove-wearing habit.

"Hm—ayah—very pretty," observed the Inspector appreciatively. "Why did you have Mrs. Turner and the other young lady—Miss Barolle, is it?—lodged in that there gods-forsaken room of a house?"

"I didn't have them lodged there or anywhere," Linwood protested.

"I see. You jes' didn't see to it they were properly took care of. And you didn't go meet Mrs. Turner at the station. Why didn't you?" Inspector Pettengill asked amiably.

"Because it was Monday. Monday is opening night and I'm swamped with work. If Mrs. Turner had come the day before—Sunday—" A lethal glance at me finished the sentence. "It wasn't lost on the Inspector. You'd of met her—or killed her? Your look said the second," he remarked calmly.

Linwood snorted. "My dear Inspector! Mrs. Turner seems to have prejudiced you against me! I admit she has a slight grievance. But after all, I'm concerned with the comedy she wrote, in collaboration with an established playwright. Not with her personal whims and pretensions."

"Hm, I think I see," Inspector Pettengill murmured, as if to himself, when Linwood was through. And then asked pleasantly: "What time here two scheming writers—Alden and Vickery's the names, that right?—after you to come in with them and help mess up Mrs. Turner's play?"

Linwood turned green. "Really, Mrs. Turner! I'm surprised!" he rebuked me. "I told you there was nothing to this—er—imagined hostility. . . . I give you my word, Inspector! I never took them seriously. They are just—minority stockholders. Utterly without power. If they indulge in a private grudge against Mr. Anrose and any play with an elaborate shrug again. Leaving his sentences unfinished was apparently just as much a constant habit with him as the gloves and the beret."

"Maybe so. But old Mack Rieker's been murdered, and Miss Barolle's only alive and unharmed for a little dog barking," Inspector Pettengill pointed out. "You got another explanation for them two—er—accidents?"

Linwood disdained to answer. Only lifted and dropped his shoulders expressively.

"Mrs. Turner tells me you were out last night, in the storm. When you start out," the Inspector changed the subject. Artlessly, it seemed.

Another furious, directorial glance in my direction. "I don't recall the exact minute. Toward the end of the show. I saw a storm was blowing up and hoped to get in a short walk before it broke. I can't—"

"You can't sleep 'less you have your walk. I know." The Inspector beat Linwood to the concluding shrug. "Did you make it? Did you get home dry?"

"No. I got soaked."

It is believed by the Legion men that the same person had stolen all three jars. Estimating the loss at about $20, the Legionnaires have become highly indignant.

Kirovgrad sector and wrecked the two-crew planes at a forward air-base.

However, this was among the less sensational developments of the Russian war as the Soviets unleashed their sixth offensive in the more than a month, and went forward deep into Poland and toward the Romanian frontier.

The new Russian drive overran 30 towns and villages, inflicted death upon more than 2,000 Nazis and advanced ten miles along a 19-mile front in two days. It was pointed at the White Russian rail center of Mozyr, and was said to be within nine miles of that hub.

Spearheads of Gen. Nikolai Vatutin's First Ukrainian Army advanced beyond captured Sarny, whose fall was announced in a special order of the day by Premier Marshal Joseph Stalin. One Red Army column was said in battle-front dispatches to be within 40 miles southeast of Pinsk, northwest of Sarny. The latter town is 35 miles beyond the old Polish border. Its fall split German troops in the Ukraine and those in White Russia.

Meanwhile, to the southeast other Russian troops driving for the key rail junction of Zimorinka were said to have reached the Bug River at an undisclosed point. Another front report said a Soviet spearhead was within ten miles of the Sheptovka rail center and were meeting "determined" German resistance.

So serious had the German position in Russia become that a Swedish dispatch to the London Daily Mail said Berlin termed the situation "more than critical" and Hitler conducted "continuous" conferences with his highest generals.

In Italy, American forces of the Fifth Army probed into the outskirts of Cervaro, four miles from Cassino, and the fall of the village was expected shortly. The Berlin radio said last night that the town was evacuated.

On New Britain Island in the Southwest Pacific, American Marines strengthened their hold on the Cape Gloucester area after thwarting a Japanese attempt to land troops near that base. The U. S. forces at Arave still held that key point, too, despite an enemy claim that it had been re-taken.

Gen. Douglas MacArthur's communiqué also revealed that 42 enemy barges, four luggers and other small vessels were sunk or damaged by Allied air and surface units. Most were troop-filled when caught between Sidor and Pua on the New Guinea coast.

Automobiles Must Be Inspected By Jan. 31st

Secretary of Revenue David W. Harris today impressed upon motorists the fact that all Pennsylvania owned motor vehicles must be officially inspected and all Pennsylvania motor vehicle operators must have renewed their driver's licenses by midnight, January 31st.

Urging car owners not to delay in having vehicles inspected, Secretary Harris issued a brief statement on the importance of inspection. He said:

"The present inspection campaign is probably the most important since inspections began. In the past the department has stressed safety as the primary objective of the semi-annual campaigns. Now we have the added responsibility of keeping in operation vehicles being used in essential transportation. That is a patriotic duty. No one can dispute the part being played by transportation in the winning of the war. Yet the vehicles now in use average about seven and one-half years in age with more than one-fourth of them over ten years old.

"No motor vehicles have been built since January, 1942. In normal times six or seven million cars would have been manufactured in that time. That means there are no cars available for replacement today and when the war is over, automotive experts predict, another year will pass before a new car can be purchased. The same experts believe that three or four years will elapse before the supply of new motor vehicles will begin to equal demand. Meanwhile, our present vehicles need more and more parts, replacements and repairs, in order that they may continue to give efficient service for the remainder of the war and for some time thereafter.

There were more than 24 million vehicles of all kinds in use at the outbreak of the war. Over three million cars have been cast on the scrap heap since. The remainder, or as many of them as possible, will have to continue to operate for the duration.

"If through our semi-annual inspection system a defect is discovered in a motor vehicle and corrected then it is possible such vehicles may continue to render useful service over a period of years instead of being relegated to the scrap heap. Discovering that defect NOW may save the vehicle at a time when its service is vital to the welfare of the country. That is why we regard the present inspection period which ends at midnight,

January 31st, as the most important since inspections began.

"If your car has not been inspected in this period do not delay until the last minute to have it done. There are fewer inspection stations operating than ever before and the war effort has cut down the number of skilled mechanics available for that work. By having your car inspected now you will help to avoid possible last minute congestion which makes it difficult for both car owner and inspection station operator."

THE GREAT GAME OF POLITICS

By FRANK R. KENT

New Deal now, as it has been in the past, is the indefinite continuation in power of the New Deal and the New Dealers. And the primary purpose of the "Communist Association" is the same as that of the "Communist party"—to wit, the overthrow of the American system of government and the substitution of one on Communist lines. The present Communist leadership is not entitled to credit for sincerity. Ever since 1933, when the New Deal was fully revealed, it has been a settled Communist conviction that the best way of achieving the Communist objective was through the New Deal.

THE basis of this belief was that a period of chaos is essential before the change can be made. The argument—and a sound one, too—was that the New Deal tends toward a chaotic condition out of which Communism is most likely to emerge. In that, most thoughtful conservatives agree with the Communist leaders. In at least one of their party conventions, the Communists officially declared that "the New Deal points in our direction," which accounts for the fact that as a party for ten years it has consistently supported the New Deal in everything and on all occasions. The one exception was in the matter of foreign policy. In the early days of the war, it was distinctly isolationistic so far as America was concerned, and only swung over to the Roosevelt foreign policy after Hitler attacked Russia. Up to that time its sympathies were on the other side and the sudden attack left it in an absurd position. Now, on all points, the Communists see eye to eye with the Administration. Mr. Browder was ahead even of Senators Guffy and Pepper in demanding a fourth term for Mr. Roosevelt, just as he had demanded a third term.

SO FAR as diminishing the Communist influence in the next election, the abandonment of its position as a political party will enhance it, in that it will enable the party vote to be cast solidly for Mr. Roosevelt or the New Deal candidate instead of having it partly diverted by the presence of a Communist party candidate on the ballot. The truth is that this renunciation by the Communist party of the name "Communist party"; its expressed determination to work within the two-party system and its declaration favoring free enterprise are all part of a perfectly obvious plan not to mix less in American politics but more. In brief, the Communist party and its leaders have not changed their spots. Their methods, their motives and their objectives remain the same, just as Mr. Roosevelt's remain the same.

IT MAY be that this new departure is in tune with Moscow or it may not. Mr. Stalin sometime ago disclaimed responsibility for the American Communists and all interest in American politics. Yet, a few days ago, through his official organ, Pravda, he gratuitously slapped at Mr. Willkie for an article which seemed to most persons much more pro Russian than anti, and quite innocent of offense. This seems to mark him as for Mr. Roosevelt and against Mr. Willkie for President, which is the position of the American Communists except that they are for Mr. Roosevelt as against Mr. Willkie or anyone else. The feeling that Mr. Willkie was oversteering about Russia had given sound ground for criticism. Perhaps, the Stalin slap will do him more good than harm. However, the "reconversion" of the American group to "free enterprise" is calculated to make its support of Mr. Roosevelt less publicly obnoxious—if one is credulous enough to believe in it.

BUT HOW ABOUT STEAKS?

CHICAGO—(INS)—It is estimated that approximately 25,750,000,000 pounds of meat and meat products will be produced in the next 12 months. Of this amount, it is expected that almost 17,250,000,000 pounds of dressed meat will be available for civilian use in 300,000 retail food markets, in public eating places and on the farms and ranches. This quantity is roughly about the same as the average volume used for domestic consumption in the decade before the war.

REAL AMERICANS

COLUMBUS, O.—(INS)—Employees of the Curtiss-Wright warplane plant will receive the added thrill of building 16 of the famous Curtiss-Wright Helldiver dive bombers, for service aboard an unnamed new aircraft carrier "X." Using a Treasury Department valuation of $100,000 as the cost of a dive bomber, the Helldiver-builders during their campaign, which began Sept. 22nd, have bought $1,000,037 in War Bonds through payroll

ROHM & HAAS FIVE WINS 6TH STRAIGHT LEAGUE GAME HERE

Chemical Makers Defeat Alcoa Five by Score of 46 to 25

Alcoa Team Made 11 of Its Points From The Foul Line

The Rohm and Haas dribblers won their sixth straight game in the Bristol-Burlington League last night trimming the Alcoa five, of Burlington, 46-25, on the local floor. By virtue of its victory, the chemical makers held on to their one-game lead of first place.

The Maple Beach contingent had little difficulty with the boys from across the river, amassing a 23-7 lead at half-time, principally through the shooting of Larsen and 15-sherty who made three field goals each. Berry scored four of the Jersey team's points in the first half.

Every player in the Rohm and Haas line had at least one field goal. Dougherty had four to his credit with Larsen, Murphy, and Wollard getting three each. Berry was high man for the Burlington team.

It was announced that Sunday afternoon the Rohm and Haas team will play the Bendix five of the 14 term Aircraft League. This game will begin at four o'clock. At two o'clock, the Rohm and Haas will play the Bendix five.

Both of these contests are scheduled for the Rohm and Haas court.

ARROWS TO PLAY FAST FIVE OF NAVAL HOSPITAL TEAM ON BRISTOL HIGH SCHOOL FLOOR

The Arrows, Fleetwings basketball team, will meet the fast Naval Hospital team on Friday night, at the Bristol High School gymnasium. The game will be the second of a double-header. The Bristol High School team will play the opening game of the evening.

There will be much interest in the clash of the Arrows' famous center, Mike Bloom, and Naval Hospital's 1942 All-American Hank Zeller from Washington and Jefferson. Zeller's running mate, Frank Haynak, a guard, is also a W. J. basketball luminary.

Naval Hospital has won eleven games and lost two so far this season. They have decisively beaten such teams as Kellett, Ryerson, Cramp's Navy Yard Recreiving, and the U. S. Marine team, and will be out to hang up a victory over the unbeaten Arrows who are leading the Eastern Aircraft Basketball League.

Claim Germans Fleeing Across Pre-War Poland

Moscow—The Germans, beaten backward by strong Russian forces all along the flaming eastern front, were reported fleeing across pre-war Poland today with the Red army in pursuit.

Battlefront dispatches said that spearheads of the First Ukrainian Army which encircled and captured the key rail junction of Sarny are pressing on toward Kovel, 80 miles to the west. Sarny is 38 miles beyond the old Polish frontier.

"The Germans are retreating in disorder westward from Sarny," one dispatch said.

Another spearhead, north of the rail junction which controlled German north-south troop movements in eastern Poland, was reported less than 40 miles from the rail and river junction of Pinsk.

Meanwhile, to the northwest, another Russian offensive drove relentlessly across White Russia and other Red army forces surged toward the key rail junction of Zhmerinka.

(A BBC broadcast reported that in their newest offensive through lower White Russia, Red army units now have reached a point within some 12 miles of Mozyr, big rail hub and immediate objective of the thrust.)

U. S. Troops Fan Out from Cervaro

Algiers—American troops of the Fifth Army fanned out from the fallen mountain stronghold of Cervaro today as French forces—including some Yanks under French command—consolidated newly won heights overlooking the Cassino plain.

After Cervaro fell Wednesday afternoon the Americans also seized Mount Caprara after a hard fight.

Today's communique was the first official announcement that Americans were fighting under French officers.

The Yanks engaged in forward patrol activity, fanning out ahead of the little town that the Germans had fortified heavily in an effort to protect Cassino and the valley approaches to Rome, 79 miles further. It revealed that French troops recaptured Mount Raimo in savage fighting, and also drove the Nazis off Mount Molino to re-take that strategic height.

Veteran French troops launched their attack in the region of Rocchetta and advanced slowly in the face of strenuous German efforts to halt them. At several points they punched their way to depths of 1,000 yards as they pressed forward to seize heights that included recaptured Raimo and Molino.
